Why we want you

The cancer voices community brings together individual people with personal experience of cancer, which they are willing to share to help achieve change. In partnership with Macmillan, cancer voices share their diverse lived experiences to influence our work. Share your lived experience of cancer at a variety of one-off events and discussions to ensure the needs and voices of people directly affected by cancer properly influence cancer services, support, policy, and decision making.

What you will be doing

- Sharing your lived experience of cancer and cancer services with a range of relevant stakeholders at one off events - such as interviews, meetings, discussions, focus groups, and round table events
- Sharing your lived experience of cancer, for inclusion in internal and external Macmillan research, inquiries, studies, reports, and publications

The skills you need

- Personal experience of cancer or experience of caring for/supporting someone with cancer
- An interest in learning more about ways to influence what we do
- Willingness and confidence to share your experience of cancer to inform and shape Macmillan's work

What's in it for you

- Use your experience of cancer, care, and services to improve others' experience, and help shape what Macmillan does and how we do it
- Learn about the work teams across Macmillan are doing
- The help and support you need to contribute to events and discussions
- Agreed out-of-pocket expenses (reimbursed within our guidelines)
